The Boss's Pay

The median value of salaries, bonuses, long-term incentives, and grants of stock and stock options for the chief executives of 200 major U.S. companies declined 0.9% to $6.95 million, according to an analysis for The Wall Street Journal by the Hay Group management consultancy.

The drop in total direct compensation was only the third since 1989, when the Journal began tracking CEO pay. In 2008, pay fell 3.4%. The analysis also showed that highly paid CEOs generally run companies that deliver better-than-average shareholder returns.

Charles Ergen, CEO and founder of Dish Network Corp., earned the distinction of having the harshest drop in pay. He drew a $623,100 salary that was 92.5% lower than his 2008 total compensation, even though the company's stock doubled.

Jeffrey R. Immelt, chief executive of General Electric Co., declined a bonus for the second straight year, pushing his total pay lower by 4.7% to $5.1 million. GE's stock fell 6.6% last year.

In contrast, Ray R. Irani, CEO of Occidental Petroleum Corp., collected $52.2 million, making him the highest paid executive surveyed. Mr. Irani has been among the Journal's best paid every year since 2004. The company's stock rose 36% last year.

This year's overall decline reflected the recession, government controls and continued public outcry over big pay packages. Long -term incentive awards, mostly stock and stock options, were hardest hit, falling 4.6% to a median $5 million. Median means half the CEOs made more and half made less. Salaries and bonuses rose 3.2% to $2.64 million.

As the recession deepened in late 2008, "many boards lowered targets for 2009—and so some CEOs collected bonuses even as profits declined," said Irv Becker, head of Hay's U.S. executive-compensation practice.

Pay curbs appear to be ending. Several companies recently thawed frozen salaries or canceled pay cuts. Pfizer Inc. in February lifted a pay freeze that hit Chief Executive Jeffrey Kindler, lifting his pay to $1.8 million from $1.6 million.
